

Early Modern Substance(s): Branded, Generic, One-offs, ONE

Ed McCann (University of Southern California)

After a brief survey of the main alternative conceptions of substance extant in the early modern period we'll focus our attention on an argument that Locke made against the Cartesian doctrine of 'branded' finite substances, i.e. substances with intelligible natures.